“Blue ICS” Command and Control for First Responders

This is a participatory class that begins with a discussion of one approach to dealing with higher risk calls. This discussion includes the application of ICS principles to all levels of law enforcement responses to increase the safety for both responders and citizens.

The class is primarily taught through tabletop scenarios. The scenarios are designed to give students opportunities to apply these principles using checklist cards and other management tools to more safely manage responses to various high-risk incidents.

The main tenet of this class is that ICS principles can be effectively used by line level, initial responders to increase safety for themselves and for affected citizens from the outset of almost any call.

Towards this goal, the "Blue ICS" class is designed primarily for the first responder and the lowest levels of supervision within an organization. Although, anyone who might be a part of the command and control efforts of any incident, at any point during the incident, is a candidate for this training.

It is helpful but not required for students to have previously attended some incident command training prior to attending this class.
